Eve Kakassy Hobgood

Nature's Antidote

During my time working in New York City, I began photographing flowers, but never had the time to fully explore my fascination with them. The onset of Covid-19 and the ensuing lockdown gave me a reason to shift my focus to something peaceful amidst the uncertainty that we all felt. I tend to turn to nature in times of chaos, and it was in walking with my kids that I saw the beauty of the many local floral varieties. It renewed my photographic inspiration.

Working with many local farmers and The Umstead's floral designer, The Watered Garden, I began buying dahlias, delphiniums, and poppies by the bucket. I would take these buckets home and shoot the blossoms in my studio with northern light against a seamless white backdrop. The flowers shot against the white backdrop have an eye-opening effect and make their colors really pop.

It is my hope that these images will provide the same sense of peace and calm to those who see them as I felt when I was working with them.
